

Can You See Me Now?

More and more recycling operations are using reflective vests to identify visitors when they walk through the facility. The vest is a good way to let equipment operators know there's somebody on site who may not be aware of the hazards in this place. Ground workers can watch out for these vest-wearers as well, keeping an eye out to make sure they don't go into a high hazard area.

Some recyclers use different color vests to identify new employees for a period of time, say three months. This lets experienced workers know to watch out for them and assist in their orientation to the business. It's a signal to help make common sense "common".
